

hang Congress up and have the Government shut down and default on debt in the next couple of weeks. Let us have this debate about priorities. But let us do that in December on the reconciliation bill.

But I did want to take the floor today simply to say this is not as it is characterized by some as one side of the aisle wanting to cut spending and the other side does not. I think I have just demonstrated in at least one of the largest areas of Federal spending where there is precious little appetite to do anything other than to spend more by conservatives who come to the floor. It is a big jobs program. There is no belt-tightening when that bill comes up.

I hope when we debate and sort through these priorities in the middle of December and write a reconciliation bill that we will do the best with what each side wants: expanding economy, more jobs, and better opportunity in the private sector. We also want to ensure fairness in the spending priorities and budget priorities here in the Congress.

I think when Kevin Phillips, who is not a Democrat—a Republican—evaluates the set of priorities that is brought to us now by the Republicans, it demonstrates once again that there is plenty of room for disagreement, and I think also plenty of room for compromise hopefully in the middle of December when the American people would expect us to reach agreement. But, between now and then, there is no excuse to have the Government shut down or to have a default at the end of this evening.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

PAYMENT OF VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I was in Amarillo, TX, this weekend dedicating a veterans' hospital addition, and I met a couple from Friona, TX. He is a disabled veteran. They were concerned about news reports they had heard over the weekend that veterans' benefits would not be paid if the Government is shut down.

I am taking to the floor because I want to make sure that the veteran from Friona, TX, and every other veteran in this country knows that veterans' benefits will be paid December 1 unless this administration decides that that is not the priority. I hope this administration will not do that.

Veterans' benefits are a priority. Veterans' benefits are an entitlement. Never before have veterans' benefits not been paid when there has been a temporary shutdown of Government.

So I came back to make sure. I talked to the budget committees. I talked to the veterans' committees. We consulted the Congressional Research Office to see if there was any merit in this alleged nonpayment of veterans' benefits, and in fact we were told that they had never heard of anything like that. And in fact unless the administration made the decision affirmatively to pay welfare recipients but not veterans, that in fact veterans would be paid.

So I wish to take the floor to tell the veterans of this country that most certainly they will be paid. There is cash flow to do that regardless of whether there is a continuing resolution or if the President vetoes the continuing resolution there are funds to pay the veterans' benefits, the next ones of which go out December 1. So I think it would be highly appropriate if the Veterans Administration would reassure the veterans of that because they are getting mixed signals.

In my home State of Texas, some veterans' offices are saying, of course, checks are going to go out, and some Veterans Administration offices are saying they do not know; that it is up in the air. And then there are reports that reporters calling the Veterans Administration here are getting the word that they will not go out. So there is confusion by the administration on this point. But there is no confusion on the part of Congress that veterans' pay is absolutely essential, that it is covered, and that the checks will go out December 1.

So I hope that the Veterans' Administration will, indeed, clarify this so that our veterans are not worried that their payments are of lesser stature than those of welfare recipients in this country.

I thank the Chair. I yield the floor.

REPUBLICAN PLAN

Mr. INHOFE. Mr. President, while I was presiding, I was desirous of responding to some of the things that had been said about the subject of this morning's business by a number of the Members of the Congress, specifically one from North Dakota.

During the course of his remarks, he talked about a plan, about the fact that the Republicans have talked about the plan that we had that we are going to discuss, that we have sent to the President that will reach a balanced budget in a period of 7 years, as if somebody else had a plan. I suggest that there is no other plan. If there is a plan, I have not seen it.

The Senator was talking about repeating some of the things that had been said over and over again having to do with reducing Medicare in order to give tax breaks to the rich. I want to say, every time I hear that, that the Republicans had no intention at any point of reducing Medicare. The Republicans gave a program that would have the effect of increasing Medicare by approximately 6.4 percent each year. That would be if a person were getting the maximum Medicare, as accorded today under the current law. That person would receive $4,800 a year. At the end of the 7-year period, that same individual would be getting $6,700 a year.

There is no way to say that that could be considered as a cut in Medicare. To say over and over and over again, with redundancy that is unbearable, that the Republicans are going to try to use cuts in Medicare—which I just talked about, that there are no cuts in Medicare—to give tax breaks to the rich is being unreasonable. Mr. President, 90 percent of the tax breaks that would come from a $500 tax credit per child would go to families under $100,000 of income.

But I want to get down to the point where he was talking about our Nation's defense. He was talking about the Senate bill that was too high, talking about the appropriations bill that was actually some $7 billion more than asked for by the military. I think we all know, being realistic, that when there is a Democrat in the White House, the military is going to be influenced by what that Democrat or a Republican in the White House might want.

We saw what happened back in the 1970's when we had a Democratic President in Jimmy Carter, and we saw our defense budget going down, going down and, of course, the social programs going up. Until such time as 1980, we did not have enough money for spare parts, and we found it necessary after 1980, up to 1985, to increase spending on defense by about 40 percent.

We do not want that to happen again, and yet we have seen during the course of this administration cuts in our defense budget to the extent that right now we are where we were in 1980.

This concerns me, because right now there is a crisis that is taking place and a decision that has been made by this President to send up to 25,000 troops on to the ground in Bosnia. You can talk about doing this and act like the budget is going to remain static during this time, and yet the foreign policy of this administration has put more and more money into humanitarian gestures. Mr. President, to the extent that he has had to come back to this Congress for emergency supplementals.

This is the position we have found ourselves in: We have a Republican-elected House and Senate. We have control. The Republicans gained control in the 1994 elections. And yet we have a President who sends our troops off on humanitarian missions, having no relativity to our Nation's defense. We sent them off to Somalia. Of course, our troops went to Somalia in December under the last month of the Bush administration. And yet, once that humanitarian mission, as described by President Bush when we sent the troops over to Somalia, was over, we time and time again pleaded with President Clinton to bring our troops back from Somalia. There was no mission there that related to our Nation's security interests. Yet, he did not bring them back and they did not come back until 18 of our troops were murdered in cold blood and dragged through the mud through the streets of Mogadishu.
